Brief

Guilin is a dream woven by mountains and rivers. The Li River meanders like a green silk ribbon, and the clear water reflects the majestic mountains. The breeze blows gently, the ripples ripple lightly, and the light and shadow change like a dream. Elephant Trunk Hill stands by the river, like a giant elephant drinking, and is very cute. The bamboo raft on the Yulong River sways gently, shuttling between the mountains and rivers, as if entering an ink painting. Every inch of the scenery is full of poetry, making people intoxicated in this fairyland on earth and reluctant to leave.

Eating

Guilin is not only famous for its beautiful scenery, but also for its delicious food. Have a bowl of smooth and chewy Guilin rice noodles, with a rich marinade and rich side dishes, which has a long-lasting taste. Yangshuo beer fish, live fish from the Lijiang River meets mellow beer, fresh and spicy, without any fishy smell. Lipu taro braised pork, a perfect blend of taro and pork belly, is soft and glutinous without being greasy. There are also sour and spicy appetizing Guilin snails and the unique Gongcheng oil tea, every bite is Guilin style.

◆ Guilin Rice Noodles 桂林米粉

Round, smooth, flexible, and exquisitely made, first grind the best rice into pulp, put it into bags and filter it, knead it into dough, cook it, and then press it into round roots or slices. Paired with pork bone soup or chicken soup, and with chopped green onions, coriander, dried tofu and other ingredients, it tastes delicious.

◆ Yangshuo Beer Fish 阳朔啤酒鱼

Yangshuo's specialty is fresh carp from the Li River in Yangshuo, fried in tea oil and then braised in Guilin's premium beer. The fish is fresh, spicy and delicious, without any fishy smell, and the aroma of beer and fish can whet your appetite.

◆ Lipu Taro Braised Pork 荔浦芋扣肉

Lipu Taro Braised Pork is a famous dish in China. The ingredients used are exquisite. Lipu taro and pork belly with skin are selected from Guilin's specialty, Guilin fermented bean curd and a variety of secret condiments. When making it, the pork is first boiled thoroughly, fried until golden brown, and cut into small pieces. Then it is paired with Lipu taro cubes, spread with fermented bean curd, steamed in a large bowl, and finally served upside down. The finished pork belly is fat but not greasy, and the taro is crispy and soft. The two are cleverly combined, rich in layers, and have an excellent taste. It is a delicious dish with Guilin characteristics.

◆ Guilin Field Snails 桂林田螺

Guilin snails are a very distinctive local snack, and can be regarded as a vivid epitome of the local food culture. The snails here have a unique shape, a short and round body, a pointed tail, a large head, and firm and full snail meat, which is tender and chewy. When eating, you need to use a tool to pick open the top of the snail, and then suck hard with your mouth, so that the snail meat can be sucked out, which is quite interesting and skillful. After eating the snail meat, the bowl of fresh and fragrant snail soup is the essence, which is a blend of the heat of pepper and the deliciousness of snails, and the taste is very spicy.

◆ Jeonju Vinegar Blood Duck 全州醋血鸭

Quanzhou Vinegar Blood Duck, as a representative local specialty, carries the rich heritage of the thousand-year-old food culture. Its production techniques are deeply imprinted with regional characteristics, with a unique vinegar aroma and spicy taste as the soul, telling the long-standing food culture of Quanzhou. The most amazing thing about this dish is that it is poured with duck blood made with sour water before being served. The sour water formula varies from family to family, making each vinegar blood duck have a unique flavor, which can be called the mark of Quanzhou on the tip of the tongue.

◆ Gongcheng Camellia 恭城油茶

Gongcheng oil tea is a treasure of Guilin cuisine and a traditional delicacy with unique characteristics. It is made of old black tea leaves, which are fried in oil until slightly burnt to give off a strong aroma. Salt and ginger are then added to cook the tea soup, which is thick and astringent with a distinct spicy taste. In Gongcheng, people also cleverly add peanuts, sesame seeds, glutinous rice and other ingredients to make the taste more layered. When tasting, it is served with rice popcorn, crispy fruits, pickled vegetables and other side dishes, and the salty and crispy taste blends with the mellow tea flavor. taste feast.
